
Conclusions
Our findings suggest that consumption of fermented food is associated with enrichment in metabolites (conjugated Linoleic Acid) in the gut potentially associated with health. These encouraging results motivate further studies exploring how specific fermented foods can impact the gut microbiome and overall health across populations.